Apartheid is the name of the racial institution that was established in 1948 by the National Party that governed South Africa until 1994. The term, which literally means "apartness," reflected a violently repressive policy designed to ensure that whites, who comprised 20% of the nation's population, would continue to dominate the country.

As its name suggests, Saul Dubow's Apartheid, 1948–1994 is an account of apartheid's emergence and establishment; it is also an examination of the challenge to apartheid and therefore of its eventual—if incomplete—undoing. The book is primarily organized by narrative history and chronology. Chapter 1 deals with the partisan white politics that brought the National Party (NP) to power with the promise of apartheid.
