A moving, sometimes hilarious account of a family trying to hold itself together, A Stone of the Heart chronicles the dysfunction of a Queens, New York, Irish-Catholic family. Set in 1961, the book is narrated by the family's oldest son, fourteen-year-old Michael—overweight and obsessed with baseball statistics—who is trying to come to grips with his parents' disastrous ma.

This is the first book in the Irish Angel series. Jill Marie has done an outstanding job with this first installment, and I now look forward to reading the second book, Heart of Lies. This book takes right up right where Heart of Stone left off - a detective Laura hired to search for her siblings might just have found one of her sisters. Wow, what a way to end it. I highly recommend this entertaining and lovely book! I reviewed this book for Zondervan.

The Overlook Press (February 2003) $21.95 (225pp) 978-1-58567-365-0. Following the trail of Lewis and Clark while researching this novel, the author came upon a white rock near Decision Point, the spot where a group of white explorers took the humble advice of Sacajawea, one of their interpreters and the only woman on their expedition. This real rock found its way into the fiction of this real woman, for it inspired her to create a dream for Sacajawea's grandmother, a dream in which her ...
